QUESTIONS ANSWERED.

Osteopathy Is Many Things in One and a Boon to the Sick.

(From our Special Correspondent.)

Franklin, Ky., May 20th, 1901.

EDITOR KENTUCKIAN:—

WHAT IS OSTEOPATHY? is the question most frequently asked.

It is many things in one. It accomplishes a variety of results by simple methods.

It uses the bones as levers to relieve the pressure on the nerves, veins and arteries that should not suffer pressure.

Osteopathy can cope with all disease.

The medicines used are food, air and water.

The curative properties and powers of the body are within the body itself.

Take the stomach. Its secretions are controlled by certain nerves and nerve centers. If these do their work there is health—if not, illness; where they do not there is an obstruction Osteopathy removes it.

"Nerve force," "blood force" are the two forces that make health.

Disease is nothing more than obstruction between nerve force and blood force. The Osteopath watches to see that the machinery of the body works right.

Does an engineer throw a gallon of oil into his engine if a bolt gets loose? He fixes the bolt.

The Osteopathy studies the human machine as a machinist and puts it mechanically in harmony.

This treatment gets behind innumerable ills. This makes the Osteopath a specialist in anatomy. He becomes accustomed to quick detection of disturbance of nerve centers or circulatory structures.

Osteopathy is in its nature a cause remover. The Osteopath treats the nerve and blood supply for catarrh. For rheumatism his treatment aims to prevent the formation of acids. In dyspepsia the nerve and blood supply to the stomach is harmonized. In insomnia the hidden cause is attacked. In short the nerve supply is the objective point of the Osteopath.

Osteopathy threatens to abolish the surgeon's knife in cases where it is now so indiscriminately used. The horrors which female diseases cover are largely banished by Osteopathy.

It is worth investigation. We will aid you with literature.
